I've enjoyed following historian Bob Nicholson on Twitter, @DigiVictorian. He often posts examples of interesting things he finds in old newspapers, which as longtime readers know is also an interest of mine.. These two particular examples are even on similar themes to my own areas of fascination, that is, modernity and beards:

It's not about the amount of genetic variation that makes the difference, it's the effect of the variants that do make the difference. It's like saying that some ethnic groups being more predisposed to being lactose intolerant is a social construct not supported by genetics, because all individuals in those groups are 99.9% genetically identical, while all human genomes are 99.9% ...
